Dirtworks, PC Landscape Architecture
to be featured in GardenStory

New York, NY – November 16, 2006 – Dirtworks, PC, a New York City-based landscape architecture firm will be featured in a documentary for public television, GardenStory.

GardenStory is a ten-part series focusing on the way gardens transform our lives and communities. The documentary will feature Dirtworks' restorative gardens in one of its episodes. The Joel Schnaper Memorial Garden in New York City, the Life Enrichment Center in Kings Mountain, North Carolina, and the Legacy Groves of Somerset County, Pennsylvania, commemorating the events of September 11, will be presented as engaging examples of the power of restorative gardens to support health and well-being, assuage grief and enrich the lives of patients, visitors and staff in various types of healthcare facilities. The half-hour program will be broadcast in late 2007.

“The goal of the Legacy Groves project is to bring the community together for a meaningful purpose that can promote healing and understanding. The concept behind the Legacy Groves was to extend the simple act of planting – planting a tree and nurturing them to maturity – across the county,” according to David Kamp, President of Dirtworks, PC.

GardenStory (www.gardenstory.org) is a collaboration between two landscape architecture professionals, Reuben Rainey and Rebecca Frischkorn who are also co-authors of the book on the Harlem Renaissance poet, “Half My World: The Gardens of Anne Spencer, A History and Guide,” winner of the 2004 Honor Award from the American Society of Landscape Architects.
